The fight for America's agricultural heartland heats up as Iowa drags on. The U.S. Department of Agriculture released a new version of its draft map for the 2020 census on Wednesday, reaffirming a city-by-city count of the white population. The plan addresses a population shift in rural and suburban areas after the 2010 census, counting people who no longer live in towns, as well as one-time residents who have since left. The $4 billion census, combined with the states, will shape the U.S.'s political boundaries for a decade, determining the number of seats in the House of Representatives, funding for school systems and local aid, and billions of dollars in federal dollars. A "six-to-five margin" determines victory in a given district, but state legislative majorities of one have been harder to come by. Get top headlines in your inbox every afternoon. Sign up for the free PM Report newsletter. Voters in the largest metro areas often swing elections. Texas and California, and Colorado and Nevada, have been a strong Democratic advantage for several cycles, but in the Midwest, including states like Iowa, which leans Republican, statehouse seats have flipped since the 2010 census. The redder the state, the more likely it has been to vote Republican in the past two election cycles, with the exception of the Midwest. The farther west one travels, the stronger the effect appears to be, according to analysis from the Washington Post. The U.S. Department of Agriculture's 2020 draft map released Wednesday reaffirms the city-by-city count of the white population, which is projected to be released in August. The draft census map reaffirms state-level "majority" and "tipping point" population statistics. "The difference between the majority and minority population is where we take our target seats," Paul Adams, director of research for the Pew Charitable Trusts, who worked on the draft census for two years, told the Des Moines Register. "There is no way for a party to win a state with anything less than a majority of the population." The decision to support the "pied piper" approach in rural areas is a key reason for the shift, according to Adams. "These locations are often represented by a single state legislative district," Adams said. "
